Women and Research in the Regions

Edith Dircksey Cowan was a remarkable pioneering Australian female leader, who overcame significant and entrenched obstacles to women's participation in the public sphere. This public lecture is aimed to highlight the need for more women to become involved in research. Like the namesake of ECU, the speakers are both women. They are from very different fields of expertise and have been highly successful in their careers. The event is aimed to highlight the vital role of women in research, and why there is a need for more women to become involved in research relevant to the regions, in a period when our nation tackles important issues such as those associated with sustainability, population growth, environmental issues, social problems and an ageing population.
